Draft opinion	Amendment
points out that measures for the recruitment of workers from third countries cannot and should not replace large-scale, long-term investments in education and vocational training for EU residents. This investment should be geared more towards jobs identified as being strategically important or deficit occupations and it should be used to develop specific measures to support those wishing to train in these areas.	points out that measures for the recruitment of workers from third countries cannot and should not replace large-scale, long-term investments in education and vocational training for EU residents. Taking in consideration that many countries, especially Eastern European countries face with the phenomenon of brain drain (skills emigration), which puts a country/region at risk for depopulation and for the emigration of intellectuals, this investment should be geared more towards jobs identified as being strategically important or deficit occupations and it should be used to develop specific measures to support those wishing to train in these areas.

Strategies targeting the labour shortage in some specific economic domains should include not only initiatives connected to the economic integration of young migrants from a third world country, but also the specific situation of Eastern European countries too regarding the emigration of intellectual
